Man-made pollution and changes in chemical composition of food, fish and water in the USA. Acquired changes in environmental contaminants as a result of man-made pollution have been demonstrated in the US. These changes may compromise public health by causing adverse effects on human health. This paper reviews findings on the occurrence of selected persistent organic contaminants (POCs) in food, fish and water in the US, and examines whether there is evidence that the tested-for contaminants or their biomarkers show evidence of change. A summary of 153 peer-reviewed studies performed since 1970s is presented in the light of 42 studies performed since 1980. Data analysis has focused on recent studies where levels of biomonitoring markers or frequency of adverse health effects of selected POCs are described. The paper also examines some changes in composition of the collected samples, such as a steep decline in mercury levels in fish from the 1970s to the 1990s, alterations in lead, PCB and dioxin levels in human tissues, and the decreasing trends in polychlorinated biphenyl (PCB) congeners, DDX and HCB. The compiled data suggest evidence of changes in the levels of contaminants in those types of samples. Except for mercury, the data review shows no parallel effect on chemical levels in fish as a result of reductions in levels in other fish species and terrestrial species. In human blood, the data demonstrate a similar trend of decreasing levels of contaminants, despite the lack of changes in specific compounds such as dioxin and furans. Data on changes in chemical composition of aquatic samples and the biological tissues from fish and other biota do not appear to provide a viable means of characterizing possible endocrine-disrupting chemicals due to the fact that either no change in chemical levels or a high degree of variation in selected chemicals was reported. I think he was a great selection by the GM at the time, Mike DeCourcy, who sent me a message that, "This is a great guy. He's a real people person. He'll be a good fit for the team, especially since you're related to him." My son said to me, "Dad, don't worry, he will be fine. He'll be a good fit." Over the years, I watched Bob slowly become more and more quiet and "difficult" to get along with; sometimes to the point that he became downright stubborn. I let him know, on numerous occasions, "Dad, what do you want me to do, fire him?" He'd always say, "Dad, he works for me. I'll do what I want." He wasn't a yes man but he didn't make a fuss; he just knew what he wanted and went about doing it. I think that's what made him such a good GM. The former GM was a smaller man. He had a quiet presence. He usually seemed to be very in charge; never taking any nonsense from people. But he didn't have Bob's warmth, charm and charisma, and this difference made a huge difference. I think DeCourcy had the right first impression about Bob, but it didn't work out. It's sad, but I'm sure Bob would have been an asset to any team. His quiet demeanor (don't know why people thought it was a lack of warmth) wouldn't allow him to be as effective as he could be. My recommendation is to hire Bob to any position, even if it's not his job title, but if you do, make him work for you.
