Plasma fibrinogen levels were measured in patients with cirrhosis of different etiologies and compared with the portal venous pressure. There was a significant positive correlation between the two parameters only in the group of patients with alcoholic liver cirrhosis. Serum fibrinogen levels in the other groups of patients did not correlate with portal venous pressure. These results show that portal venous pressure measurements are essential in the evaluation of the effects of fibrinogen on the degree of portal hypertension in cirrhotic patients.bibr29-1759091415587502]; [@bibr38-1759091415587502]; [@bibr47-1759091415587502
