I have a stored procedure in MySQL that returns several columns, but I need to only get the distinct results from it. I'm using Entity Framework 4.1 and Visual Studio 2010 (at least for the data access). If I have a single column in a SELECT statement, then I can use the Distinct() extension method and everything will be fine. However, I can't use Distinct() because my stored procedure returns several columns. How can I solve this problem? A: Another option is to create an association, and use the HasForeignKey() method, as demonstrated here. Something like this: `var result = context.Products.Select(p => new {p.ProductID, p.ProductName}).Distinct();` Or, if you need the entire result of the database query into memory at once: `var result = context.Products.Select(p => new {p.ProductID, p.ProductName}).ToList();` The fuel cell battery is a power supply system which is a combination of an electrochemical generator and a fuel cell.
